

I watch with a sense of sadness, these programs about people pouring their lives into remote shelters, bunkers to survive the collapse of civilization. Hoarding food, the ability to live off the grid, and the creation of booby traps and stock piling weapons and ammunition against the implosion of a government... it again says something to us about how this world is viewed.

People have been trying to figure out how to live with an awareness that the end is near for all time. The fact is, civilizations do radically change. Governments fail. Monetary collapse. Sometimes it is famine. Sometimes it is war. Sometimes it is environmental.

None of those really cause me much concern. Peter instructed Christians of the 1st century to do some preparation for end times as well. It had nothing to do with converting assets to gold, silver or precious metals. There were no instructions about bunker living or cave dwelling. His instruction was about discipline and prayer. He urged Christians to step up their game in regards to loving each other, hospitality, and sharing.

The focus was not on what you can gather around you, but on who you can help. We are called to share the gifts we receive to serve each other.

Hoarding or sharing... seems to say a lot about us.

Grace and Peace,

Carl

A Family of God

October 11, 2015

A wise sage I once knew (and I am thinking Gerald Webring would get a chuckle out of my calling him a wise sage) once told me, "At my age, I'm not buying any green bananas."

So how does your life reflect the way you see this life and your place in it? I've seen people living lots of ways in this world. While serving on an ambulance service I had a call for a man who had a heart attack and died while planting a sapling. The gentleman was 97.

Some go through the world with the philosophy of "I'd rather wear out than rust out." Others approach the world like a library, gathering what they can and surrounding themselves with it, then cautiously loaning select pieces out to others.

I do see the value in knowing how you see the world. If one's conversation is solely about farming, cattle, business or the economy, there is an observation to be made. If the focus of the conversation is recreation, sports, pleasurable pursuits, again... we learn something.
